Conclusion

Fire was the most common hazard in the month of March. It occurred almost every day in last month and caused death and injuries as well as huge damage to the property. However, response and preparedness were quite inadequate. Along with fire, other types of localized disasters such as thunderstorm, embankment collapse, building collapse and landslide were reported in March. Landslide was manmade and development induced. It occurred because of construction of road through the hills. Poor awareness about safety measures resulted in building collapse and loss of seven lives. The government system responded to several incidents however, resources that it could mobilize were not adequately to meet the challenges.
